Start of Block: Psychosocial

PsychoStress Psychosocial hazards are aspects of work that can cause stress or strain. While stress itself is not an injury, experiencing high levels of stress frequently or over a long period can lead to harm. This may include mental health problems such as anxiety, depression, or sleep issues, as well as physical health problems like fatigue, chronic illness, or injury. Below is a list of common psychosocial hazards. Please indicate the extent to which you personally experience each of these in your work or business.

SN1 We are now going to ask you to name important people in your life. Please only use first names, nicknames, or initials. If two people have the same name, then add a last initial or something to uniquely identify them. You can list as many or as few people as you like. Please list all the people you feel close to and/or would seek out for assistance with any personal, work-related problem, or stressful situation. Please take your time and enter anyone you can think of that you feel close with or would seek out for assistance with a problem, or someone might talk to about a personal or work-related problem. You may use your phone or social media accounts to help you with these names. Remember to make sure you can differentiate between anyone who might share the same name. You will be provided an opportunity in the next screen to give details about your relationship with this person, so there is no need to record any relationship information about the person here.
